

today at I'd like to turn our attention and get your views about an argument over the role of markets in the realm of human reproduction and procreation. now with infertility clinics people advertise for egg donors and from time to time in the Harvard Crimson
ads appear for egg donors, have you seen them? there was one that ran a few years ago it wasn't looking for just any egg donor, it was an ad that offered a large financial incentive for a donor from a woman who was intelligent athletic at least five foot ten and with at least fourteen hundred or above on her SAT's how much do you think the person looking for this together was willing to pay for an egg from a woman of that description
what would you guess?
thousand dollars?
fifteen thousand? ten?
I'll show you the ad fifty thousand dollars for an egg but only a premium egg what do you think about that?
well there are also sometimes ads in the Harvard crimson and in a other college newspapers for sperm donors so the market in reproductive capacities is an equal opportunity market well not exactly equal opportunity they're not offering fifty thousand dollars for sperm but there is a company a large commercial sperm bank that markets sperm it's called California cryobank it's a for-profit company it imposes exacting standards on the sperm it recruits and it has offices in Cambridge between Harvard and MIT and in Palo alto near Stanford

cryobank's marketing materials play up the prestigious source of its sperm here is from the web site of cryobank
the information here they talk about the compensation although compensation should not be the only reason for becoming of sperm donor we are aware of the considerable time and expense involved in being a donor so you know what they offer? donors will be reimbursed seventy five dollars per specimen up to nine hundred dollars a month if you donate three times a week and then they add, we periodically offer incentives such as such as movie tickets our gifts certificates for the extra time and effort expended by participating donors it's not easy to be a sperm donor they accept fewer than five percent of the donors who apply their admission criteria are more demanding than Harvard's the head of the sperm bank said the ideal sperm donor is six feet tall with a college degree brown eyes blond hair and dimples for the simple reason that these are the traits that the market has shown the customers want quote, quoting the head of the sperm bank, if our customers wanted high school dropouts we would give them high school dropouts.

so here are two instances the market in eggs for donation and the market in sperm that raise a question a question about whether eggs and sperm should or should not be bought and sold for money.
as you ponder that I want you to consider another case involving a market
and in fact a contract in human reproductive, in the human reproductive capacity and this is the case of commercial surrogate motherhood. and it's a case that wound up in court some years ago it's the story of baby M it began with William and Elizabeth Stern, a professional couple wanting a baby but they couldn't have one of their own, at least not without medical risk to Mrs. Stern. they went to an infertility clinic where they met Mary Beth Whitehead a twenty nine-year-old mother of two the wife of a sanitation worker she had replied to and ad that the center had placed seeking the service of a surrogate mother they made a deal they signed a contract in which William Stern agreed to pay Mary Beth Whitehead a ten thousand dollar fee plus all expenses in exchange for which Mary Beth Whitehead agreed to be artificially inseminated with William Stern's sperm, to bear the child and then to give the baby to the Sterns well you probably know how the story unfolded Mary Beth gave birth and changed her mind she decided she wanted to keep the baby the case wound up in court in New Jersey

so let's take put aside any legal questions and focus on this issue as a moral question how many believe that the right thing to do in the baby M case would have been to uphold the contract, to enforce the contract? and how many think the right thing to do would have been not to enforce that contract? so it's about the majority say enforce so let's now hear the reasons that people have either for enforcing or refusing to enforce this contract first from those, I want to hear from someone in the majority, why do you uphold the contract why do you enforce it?
who can offer a reason? yes. stand up. it's a binding contract all the parties involved knew the terms of the contract before any action was taken it's a voluntary agreement the mother knew what she was getting into all four are intelligent adults regardless of formal education or whatever so it makes sense if you know what you're getting into beforehand and you make a promise you should uphold that promise in the end. Ok, a deal is a deal in other words?
Exactly. And what's your name? Patrick is Patrick's reason the reason that most of you in the majority favored upholding the contract? yes? all right now let's hear from someone who would not enforce the contract what do you say to Patrick? Why not? Yes well I mean I agree I think contracts should be upheld when all the parties know all the information but in this case I don't think there's a way a mother before the child exists could actually know how she's going to feel about that child so I don't think the mother actually had all the information she didn't know the person that was going to be born and didn't know how much she would love that person so that's my argument so you would not, and what's your name?

Evan Wilson

Evan he says he would not uphold the contract because when it was entered into the surrogate mother couldn't be expected to know in advance how she would feel so she didn't really have the relevant information when she made that contract who else who else would not uphold the contract?

I think, I also think that a contract should generally be upheld but I think that the child has an inalienable right to its actual mother and I think that if that mother wants it then that child should have a right to that mother. you mean the biological mother not the adoptive mother. right. and why is that, first of all tell me your name. Anna.

Anna, why is that Anna?

because I think that that bond that is created by nature is stronger than any bond that is created by you know a contract.

good thank you. Who else, yes.

I disagree I don't think that a child has a inalienable right to her biological mother

I think that adoption and surrogacy are both trade offs and I agree with the point made that day it's a voluntary agreement, an individual made, and you can't apply coercion to this argument you can't apply the objection from coercion to this argument.

correct. what's your name?

Kathleen

Kathleen, what do you say to Evan, that though there may not have been, Evan claimed that the consent was tainted not by coercion but by lack of adequate information she couldn't have known the relevant information namely, how she would feel about the child I don't think her emotion content plays into this I think the emotional content or her feelings plays into this, I think in, you know, in a case of law, in the justice of this scenario, her change of feelings are not relevant if I give up my child for adoption and then I decide later on that I really want that child back too bad, it's a trade-off it's a trade off that the mother has made. so a deal is a deal, you agree with Patrick? I agree with Patrick, a deal is a deal, yes. good, yes. I would say that though I'm not really sure if I agree with the idea that the child has a right to their mother I think the mother definitely has a right to her child. and I also think there are some areas where market forces shouldn't necessarily penetrate, I think that the whole surrogate mother area smacks a little bit of dealing in human beings it seems dehumanizing and it doesn't really seem right
that's my main reason and what is could, tell us your name.
I'm Andrew. Andrew.
what is dehumanizing
about buying and selling the right to a child for money, what is the humanizing about it? well because you're buying someone's biological right I mean you can't and the law as it states you can't sell your own child like were you to have a child I believe that the law prohibits you selling it to another person. so this is like baby selling?
Right. To a certain extent, I mean though there is a contract with another person, you've made agreements and whatnot

there is an undeniable emotional bond that takes place between a mother and child and it's wrong to simply ignore this because you've written out something contractually. you want to reply to Andrew? to stay there you point out that there is an undeniable emotional bond I feel like when in this situation we're not necessarily against adoption or surrogacy in itself we're just sort of pointing out the emotional differences well but wait, it's easy to break everything down to just numbers and say well we have contracts like you're buying and selling a car but there are underlying emotions I mean you're dealing with people I mean these are not objects to be bought and sold but what about Andrew's claim that this is like baby selling I believe that adoption and surrogacy should be permitted whether I actually will partake in it is not really relevant but I think that the government should, the government should give its citizens the rights to allow for adoption and surrogacy. But adoption, adoption is not according to.. Is adoption baby selling?
well do you think you should be able to to bid for a baby that's up for adoption that's Andrew's challenge Do I think that I should be able to bid for a baby?
I'm not... sure.
it's a market I mean, I feel like the extent to which it's been applied I'm not sure if the government should be able to permit it and I have to think about it more but, Alright fair enough, are you satisfied Andrew? well ya, I think surrogacy should be permitted I think that people can do it but I don't think that it should be forced upon people that once a contract is signed it's absolutely like the end-all I think it's unenforceable so people should be free, Andrew, to enter into these contracts but it should not be enforceable in a court not in a court no.
who would like to turn on one side or the other I think I have an interesting perspective on this because my brother was actually one of the people who donated to a sperm bank and he was paid a very large amount of money he was six feet tall, but not blond he had dimples though, so he actually has, I'm an aunt now and he has a daughter she donated sperm to a lesbian couple in Oklahoma and he has have been contacted by them and he has seen pictures of his daughter but he still does not feel an emotional bond to his daughter he just has a sense of curiosity about what she looks like and what she's doing and how she is he doesn't feel love for his child so from this experience I think the bond between a mother and a child cannot be compared to the bond between the father and the child. That's really interesting. what's your name? Vivian.

Vivian
so we've got the case of surrogacy, commercial surrogacy and it's been compared to baby selling and we've been exploring whether that analogy is apt and it can also be compared, as you point out to sperm selling but you're saying that sperm selling and baby selling or even surrogacy are very different. Because they're unequal services. they're unequal services and that's because

Vivian you say that the tie, the bond, yes and also the time investment that's given by a mother, nine months cannot be compared to the man, you know going into a sperm bank looking at pornography you know, and depositing into a cup. I don't think those are equal good. Alright so we, Because that's what happens in a sperm bank. alright so, this is really interesting we have notice the arguments that have come out so far, the objections to surrogacy the objections to enforcing that contract, are of at least two kinds there was the objection about tainted consent this time not because of coercion or implicit coercion but because of imperfect or flawed information so tainted or flawed consent can arise either because of coercion or because of a lack of relevant information at least according to one argument that we've heard and then a second objection to enforcing the surrogacy contract was that it was somehow the humanizing.

now when this case was decided by the court what did they say about these arguments?
the lower court ruled that the contract was enforceable neither party had a superior bargaining position a price for the service was struck and a bargain was reached one side didn't force the other neither had disproportionate bargaining power then it went to the new Jersey supreme court and what did they do they said this contract is not enforceable they did grant custody to Mister Stern
as the father because they thought that would be in the best interest of the child but they restored the rights of Mary Beth Whitehead
lower courts to decide exactly what the visitation rights should be they invoked two different kinds of reasons along the lines that Andrew proposed first there was not sufficiently informed consent the court argued under the contract the natural mother is irrevocably committed before she knows the strength of her bond with her child she never makes a truly voluntary informed decision for any decision prior to the baby's birth is, in the most important sense, uninformed. that was the court then the court also made a version of the second argument against commodification in this kind of case this is this the sale of a child the court said or at the very least the sale of a mother's right to her child whatever idealism may motivate the participants, the profit motive predominate, permeates and ultimately governs the transaction and so regardless the court said, regardless of any argument about consent or flawed consent or full information there are some things in a civilized society that money can't buy, that's what the courts said in voiding this contract well what about these two arguments against the extension of markets to procreation and to reproduction how persuasive are they?

there was, it's true, a voluntary agreement a contract struck between William Stern and Mary Beth Whitehead but there are at least two ways that consent can be other than truly free first
if people are pressured or coerced to give their agreement and second if their consent is not truly informed and in the case of surrogacy the courts said a mother can't know even one who already has kids of her own, what it would be like to bear a child and give it up for pay. so in order to assess criticism, objection number one, we have to figure out just how free

does a voluntary exchange have to be with respect to the bargaining power and equal information question number one.
how do we assess
the second objection?
is more elusive, it's more difficult Andrew acknowledged this right? what does it mean to say there's something dehumanizing to make childbearing
transaction?
well one of the philosophers we read on this subject Elizabeth Anderson tries to give some bring some philosophical clarity to the unease that Andrew articulated she said by requiring the surrogate mother to repress whatever parental love she feels for the child surrogacy contracts convert women's labor into a form of alienated labor the surrogate's labor is alienated because she must divert it from the end from the and which the social practices of pregnancy rightly promote, namely an emotional bond with her child so what Anderson is suggesting is that certain goods should not be treated as open to use or to profit certain goods are properly valued in ways other than use what are other ways of valuing and treating?
good that should not be open to use?
Anderson says
there are many,
respect,
appreciation,
love,
honor, awe, sanctity there are many modes of valuation beyond use and certain goods are not properly valued if they're treated simply as objects of use. how do we go about evaluating that argument of Anderson? in a way it takes us back to the debate we had with utilitarianism is use

the only, in utility
is use,
the only proper way
of treating goods?
including life
military service procreation
childbearing?
and if not,
how do we figure out how can we determine what modes of valuation are fitting are appropriate to those goods several years ago there but the scandal surrounding a doctor an infertility specialist in Virginia named Cecil Jacobson he didn't have a donor catalog because unknown to his patients, all of the sperm he used to inseminate his patients came from one donor doctor Jacobson himself. at least one woman who testified in court was unnerved at how much her newborn daughter looked just like him now it's possible to condemn doctor Jacobson for failing to inform the women in advance that would be the argument about consent the columnist Ellen Goodman described the bizarre scenario as follows doctor Jacobson, she wrote, gave his infertility business the personal touch but now the rest of us, she wrote,
are in for a round of second thoughts about sperm donation

Goodman concluded that fatherhood should be something you do not something you donate, and I think what she was doing and what the philosopher Elizabeth Anderson is doing and what Andrew was suggesting with this argument about dehumanization is pondering whether there are certain goods that money shouldn't buy not just because of tainted consent but also perhaps because certain goods are properly

in a way a higher than mere use those at least are the questions we're going to pursue with the help of some philosophers in the weeks to come
